INTRO

„Nobody bites the hand that feeds him“, says the vernacular quite accurately. Applied to the current reporting we note that the torture of prisoners, even admitted from the American side, in Iraq, in Afghanistan and above all in the own country is more or less accepted by the mass media. On the other hand, the mere suspicion of torture in Syria provokes a media storm. In Central Africa Christians and Muslims have to take the blame for the occupation by French troops, while the obvious interest of the French state for an advantageous uranium source is not mentioned at all. You probably can imagine yourself how the media would react, if the Swiss nation expressed its rejection of the government's forced approach to the EU in a similar way like the Ukrainian demonstrators their pro-EU-attitude. More facts you'll find in this edition. V&C reveals strategic sedition and tactical misinformation of the media to encourage your responsibility. The readers spread it among the people until everyone is able to sense which way the wind is blowing – or to stay with the vernacular: “whose hand is feeding the media.”

America's double standard

tz. The American Secretary of State, John Kerry, opened the conference concerning Syria by sharply criticizing the use of torture and for this reason excluded President Assad from participation in a possible transition government in Syria. Aside from the fact that there is no irrefutable evidence justifying these torture accusations, one should expect, in view of these clear words from the USA that they follow these principles themselves. However this is regrettably not the case with respect to torture! The Pentagon was forced to admit in investigative reports, that prison camps in Iraq had repeatedly used torture. According to these military reports detainees were sexually abused, and also dogs were used to bite prisoners. Moreover, children were raped before the eyes of their parents, and people were brought into contact with acid-dripping objects. The permanent human-rights' violations in the US prison Guantanamo on Cuba are common knowledge. Also in Afghanistan torture was part of the daily program of the US troops. Here prisoners reported that they were locked in for months in total darkness, being forced to bear extremely loud music around the clock. Others were locked into cages in groups, not allowed to speak with each other and had to stand up for controls every two hours. Many of these prisoners had been imprisoned for years without being charged or given a trial. The US prison Bagram in Afghanistan became notorious in 2002 when two prisoners were hung from the ceiling and so brutally beaten that they died. These tortures are not just offenses committed by a few sadistic prison guards. Rather these practices were approved of and backed up by the highest levels of US administration. Tactics like ongoing deprivation of sleep as well as so called waterboarding, where a prisoner is forced under water so long that he thinks he is drowning, were legal under the Bush Administration. Both Alberto Gonzales and Michael Chertoff, ministers at that time, authored reports wherein torture to the point of death was deemed acceptable.

In light of this shocking background, we must conclude that the USA themselves do not comply with the standards that Secretary of State Kerry imposed on the Assad Administration.

Ukrainian circumstances in Switzerland – A fiction sb. In Ukraine's capital Kiev, thousands of demonstrators have been demonstrating for days against Viktor Yanukovich who was elected by the people and the Parliament in October 2012. Why? The reason is that Yanukovich does not want Ukraine to be integrated in the EU without reservation. Although President Yanukovich proposed to give important government positions to members of the opposition, the demonstrators insist on his resignation, occupying the Ministry of Justice and causing street battles.

The mass media even incites the opposition by its comments. Now imagine this scenario taking place in Switzerland. However, there it is the other way round. There, the Parliament and the President of the Confederation keep pushing towards the EU in contrast to the strong opposition. What would happen if crowds of citizens demonstrated for days in the capital Bern or other cities in Switzerland, occupying the Bundestag building as well as further administrative buildings? How would the media world react, if the opposition tried to push through against the police and security staff in the same manner as the Ukrainian opposition, throwing incendiary devices? Would we not be appalled, if police and security staff were only watching passively and were not trying to control the aggressive, rioting crowd?! Would the media also - as they did in Ukraine - attack and disparage the once democratically elected government - here pushing towards the EU?

Mass vaccination with dubious vaccine sg. At the end of 2013 the media reported, that the World Health Organization (WHO) and the United Nations Children's fund (UNICEF) are just about to vaccinate more than 20 million children against polio in the whole Middle East. The pronounced goal of the WHO is to eradicate worldwide the disease Poliomyelitis (Infantile Paralysis). Therefore the so far biggest worldwide vaccination campaign got started. If one looks at this a little more accurately though, the question arises: Which is the true aim of the WHO and the UNICEF? They use the OPV*-serum to vaccinate, which is not in use anymore in western countries because it is known that the vaccine itself causes Polio. Thus in the year 2010, 136 children got Polio in Pakistan. 107 of the affected children had been vaccinated several times with this vaccine of the WHO and the UNICEF against Polio. What goal do the WHO and the UNICEF actually pursue in reality with this "immunization campaign"? What they propagate as welfare for a population with many children, is highly questionable in the light of this fact that they use this risky vaccine.

Central Africa in the clutches of a nuclear power lobby?

hoj. The German newspaper "Zeit" (Time) reported on January 1st, 2014 about a bloody religious conflict that is disrupting Central Africa with the following headline: "To stop the brutal conflict between Christians and Muslims, the EU has decided on a military intervention in the Central African Republic." But Peter Balleis, director of the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS), responded that "the situation in Central Africa cannot justifiably be reduced to local differences in faith alone". He further explained that "Religion is being misused for political ends, while imams and church leaders are working towards guiding people towards peace and forgiveness". The 600 units the EU wants to deploy are meant to support the 1600 French soldiers already stationed in Central Africa. Critical analysts see very different intentions behind these seemingly humanitarian concerns: Radio Africa TV reported as early as 2011 on the French interest in the uranium found in Central Africa. Since France relies completely on nuclear power but has expended its natural deposits, it is now desperate for cheap uranium. Chinese and Canadian competitors are forcing the French nuclear energy giant Areva to search Central Africa for new sources of uranium. The current supply from the Republic of Niger is no longer sufficient. Around 40,000 tons of uranium are assumed to lie dormant in the region of Bakouma alone. Areva has been repeatedly accused of extorting cut-throat uranium contracts from unstable and corrupt African governments. Therefore we should at least be allowed to consider why the colonial power which once ruled over Central Africa, should mobilize 1600 troops without aiming at the own benefit from this action. Isn't it possible that religion is once more blamed simply to shield a surviving bastion of colonialism?

Animal studies verify: RFID-chip implants can cause cancer

ap. The US data protection expert Dr. Katherine Albrecht sat up and took notice when a friend told her that his bulldog died of cancer that emerged around the implanted RFID¹ chip. By her inquiries she encountered eight studies with indications that up to ten percent of the laboratory animals with implants developed a malignant tumour around the chip. "The cancer generated in some cases metastases and often led to the death of the animals." Keith Johnson, a retired pathologist and author of one study, is convinced that the RFID chips are the cause of the malignant histoid that always conglomerates around the implant. Other cancer researchers show themselves alarmed as well. They suspect that it is either about a defence reaction of the body against the implant or the electromagnetic radiation of the chip that stimulates directly the degeneration of the cells.² When RFID-chip implants have a deadly impact on animals how healthy and appropriate will it be to implant a RFID-chip into man? Will the media inform about that risk or will they keep silent just like they did about the cancer-causing effect of radio rays?
